Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Canadian Journal of Medical Science, Vol. 5: A Monthly Journal of British and Foreign Medical Science, Criticism and Mews Dr. Andrew Clark, at a meeting of the London Medical Society, read a paper On Renal Inadequacy. He began by remarking that he was often painfully struck by the great number of people suffering from ill-health of which no sufficient explanation could be given. There was, he said, no doubt that the progress of knowledge was steadily lessening this ignorance, and explaining, by the discovery of dynamical or statical conditions hitherto overlooked, cases supposed to have their origin in the distant ancestry of the patient, and believed to be practically inexplicable. Some of these cases, he believed, took their rise in a feeble and disorderly nervous system, some in a vicious digestion, some in an imperfectly acting skin, some in unsuitable conditions of life and work, some in abuse of tea, coffee, tobacco, alcohol, and other narcotics, and some in the derangement of the chemical changes which accompany and determine assimilation and disassimilation. There remained, he thought, numbers sufficient to demand and reward inquiry. Many of these cases of ill-health found their explanation in deficient excretion. As examples of this, he mentioned cases of anaemia and chlorosis due to faecal poisoning, and curable by purgatives. But a far larger number, he believed, were due to a deficient excretion of urinary solids. By renal inadequacy I mean that state of kidney in which it is unable, without material diminution of quantity, to produce a urine containing the average amount of solids and of a specific gravity greater than 1014. The deficiency of solids chiefly affects the...
