All rights reserved.IntroductionIn tough economic times, maintaining your job security can be a dicey affair. Employers are constantly looking for ways to save money. Cutting staff is sometimes the first option, but often the last. No matter when it happens, it still hurts.When employers are faced with reducing their staff, they evaluate each employee. They look at work history, attitude, accomplishments, and other factors to decide who stays and whogoes. Some layoffs are determined by how long a person has been on the job, but there are times when longevity isn't the deciding factor.More and more companies are taking quality and attitude into consideration. If they have a choice between an experienced employee with poor communication skills and less-than desirable personal qualities and a less experienced person who is confident, trustworthy, and maintains a professional attitude, who do you think will...
