Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: . that the worst is over, and that better days are coming. We have unbounded faith in that policy, leading, as it does, circumspectly but safely to Free Trade, which my friend and colleague, Herr Delbrück, and I, as his humble companion, have been enabled to pursue. And so strong is our conviction of its excellence that, if Germany should resolve upon a change in her economic policy, this change would certainly be preceded or accompanied by a change of Cabinet. Loud cheers from all benches followed this declaration. As for the Chancellor of the German Empire, you are aware, Gentlemen, that with him the love of Free Trade is not an acquired taste, for the landed gentry of Prussia are essentially Free Traders. This hereditary predilection has, however, grown into a broad principle in his mind. It has been observed that the advisers on economic...
